VERMONT TOWNS AND COUNTIES

Vermont's early history becomes extremely important in understanding the development of its counties. Claimed by both New Hampshire and New York, Vermont declared its independence in 1777, and remained a separate republic until 1791.

New Hampshire governor, Benning Wentworth, began granting land in what is now Vermont in 1754 and continued to do so until King George III determined that Vermont was a part of New York in 1763. New York then granted land and made the first attempts at organizing county government. Cloucester County was organized on 28 February 1770 and included roughly present-day Essex, Caledonia and Orange counties, and parts of Washington and Orleans.

Cumberland County, 1770, included roughly modern Windsor and Windham counties.

Albany County, 1770, included the remainder of the present state, roughly the western half.

In 1772, Cumberland County was reorganized to include the eastern half of the state, the former Cumberland and Gloucester counties.

Under the Republic of Vermont in 1779, Albany County was renamed Bennington County, and Cumberland became Unity County, then resumed its original name.

On 17 February 1781, Cumberland County was divided into Windham, Windsor and Orange counties; and Bennington County was divided into Bennington and Rutland counties.

Before Vermont became the 14th state in 1791, Addison County was taken from Rutland County 18 October 1785; and Chittenden County was taken from Addison County 27 October 1787.

After Vermont became the 14th state in 1791, seven more changes occurred: on 5 November 1792, Caledonia County was taken from Orange County, Essex County was taken from Orange County, and Franklin and Orleans Counties were taken from Chittenden; on 9 November 1802, Grand Isle County was taken from Chittenden and Franklin counties; on 1 November 1810, Washington County (called Jefferson until 1814) was taken from Addison, Caledonia, Orleans, and Orange Counties; and on 26 October 1835, Lamoille County was taken from Chittenden, Franklin, Orleans, and Washington Counties.
